

My Beautiful France: Landscapes

The greatest influences on Ronald W. Kenyon's photography have been painters, not photographers. Historically, the earliest influences derive from the landscape painters of the Barbizon School such as Corot, Daubigny and Theodore Rousseau who, in the mid-19th century, dared to move their easels outdoors and, along with Eugene Boudin, were precursors of Impressionism. Next come the Impressionists themselves, notably Monet, Renoir, Sisley and Pissarro, who produced a large corpus of landscapes. The landscapes in this book are most directly influenced by Impressionism and abstract expressionism. Among the photographers who have influenced Kenyon's work are Andre Martin in France who created impressionistic landscapes using super telephoto lenses, the Italian Luigi Ghirria master of composition and Americans such as Walker Evans and William Eggleston. Instead of just glancing at the pictures in this book, the photographer asks you to interact with them. Wonder where they were taken, the season, the time of day, the temperature, why he composed the picture in such a way or why he decided that a particular subject was worthy of capturing permanently. Most important of all, was a picture pleasing to look at and, if so, why?
