

This book is part of a series of eleven illustrated volumes entitled Surrender Management: America in Retreat. This series is a non-fiction narrative about America's most serious economic and social national problems. It presents the thesis that our nation has been practicing "surrender management" by postponing solutions to lethal problems indefinitely. Each of the books of the series contains the same first three chapters because they provide the historical background that traces the condition of national "surrender management" that is at the root of each of topics discussed in this series. Each of the books also contains a similar last chapter that reviews the proposals for change that are being advanced. This series is written for the average person, it is not an academic text; clear and simple description of the history and present magnitude of the problems are provided, followed by numerous common sense proposals for solutions. It also does not try to address all national problems; it rather selects a dozen issues that are presented as extremely serious and threatening the security of our society. The first three chapters present to the reader a view of a country in trouble, without sounding hopeless. They provide a historical analysis of how accelerating technological and social changes have disoriented and created a degree of social disorganization. Finally, they point to how our nation has begun a process of surrendering to problems deemed too difficult to confront. The national problems discussed in the books in this series include national debt, disconnected youth, illegal immigration, drugs, criminal justice, education, globalization, energy dependence, space exploration, national defense, and the moral dimension. The final chapter calls for the American people to organize in political action to save the nation. Each of the book's chapters dealing with issues are organized in three parts: first, they provide a historical background of the issue; second, they provide a graphic description of the issue as a major problem in our society today; third, they offer many proposals for change in search of solutions. These proposals for change are suggested based on their intrinsic value, disregarding the present national political polarization that would keep them from becoming viable today. Globalization is not the planned action of any nation or group; it is the inevitable and unstoppable consequence of modern technology. Managing the process of the growing globalization of the world is the responsibility of all countries. America has provided for the rest of the world, through globalization, greater national wealth and growing middle classes everywhere. Some, however, have sought to increase their gain unfairly and to the detriment of the United States. America must be forceful in the defense of its national interest and the economic wellbeing of its citizens. The concerned public is eager to hear common sense solutions that transcend political extremes. Everyone knows that many of our economic, social, and international problems have reached intolerable levels that will require drastic and painful measures. Political deadlock will continue and will bring about upheaval soon; this book is a prescription for what to do after that.
